Its construction involved a unique approach due to its extreme height and remoteness. B The Hegigio Gorge Suspension Bridge: Situated in Papua New Guinea, this pipeline is the highest suspension bridge deep within the Southern Highlands Province. The Hegigio Gorge Bridge, Baluarte River Bridge, and Balinghe River Bridge stand out for their exceptional features and challenging construction processes. Some may argue that the Hegigio Gorge Bridge is not a true bridge due to its primary purpose as an oil pipeline support structure. However, it plays a crucial role in the Southeast Mananda oil field infrastructure, built on top of an inaccessible expanse of oil discovered in 1991. The remote jungle terrain posed significant technical challenges during construction. The Baluarte River Bridge is not only the highest bridge in North America but also holds the record for the world's tallest cable-stayed bridge. This achievement was a key component of the largest bridge and tunnel highway project in North America, which aimed to improve the Pacific coast-to-Mexico interior road known as the "Devil's Backbone". The Balinghe River Bridge boasts an impressive height of 370 metres from deck to water, earning it the second highest spot globally. Its unique span length of 1088 metres is attributed to the Chinese superstition surrounding the number 8, which sounds similar to the Mandarin word for "prosperity". Initially planned as a concrete beam bridge, the project was modified due to the unavailability of suitable sand, leading to its construction as a suspension bridge. The Chenab River Bridge has a unique feature where the main steel cables are attached to concrete anchors at each end for extra stability and support. 1. FALSE 39. TRUE 40. NOT GIVEN
